INSURANCE JUSTICE

Under the finding that the statutory limit for prosecution in the New York insurance frauds has not yet passed, there is a chance for the punishment of the men who were guilty of diverting policy-holder funds to the campaign committee of the Republican party. The grand jury is convicted the campaign contributions were a criminal offense, and it will depend upon the vigor of the prosecution as to whether the guilty ones get their deserts or not.

The fact that Mr. Jerome will have charge of the matter is enough to justify the expectation that justice will be meted out so far as the actual offenders are concerned; and if the cases are carried through to their logical conclusion, Mr. Cortlyou, who received the campaign contribution for 1900 from the insurance companies, will be given the opportunity to answer on behalf of the Republican national committee.

The contributions were, in cold fact, stolen from the policy-holders. Technically the law may regard it only as a breach of trust; but the money was stolen as literally as if the policy-holders had been stood on their heads and the funds shaken out of their pockets. Mr. Cortlyou may plead that the payments came through third parties and that he was in ignorance of their source, though no such defense has been offered yet. The general public, however, will be loth to believe that a manager of a national campaign is innocent enough or ignorant enough to receive money in such large sums without being advised of its source.

When anybody gives checks for contributions running into the thousands he does it for "protection" and it is asking too much of human credulity to expect it to suppose Cortlyou got the funds without a tacit understanding that the contributors were to be repaid in political favors. Meanwhile an apology is still overdue to Judge Parker from Cortlyou and the president for their insulting reply to his charge that they were getting funds from the big New York corporation. They accused him at the time of bearing false witness in making his charge they have since seen the truth of his assertions verified of them offer the honorable affidavit which one gentleman owes another under such circumstances.—Salt Lake Herald.

Mark Kopolivich of Reno applied to the district court to have his name abbreviated to Koppie so that he can place it on his trunk without paying extra baggage on the original lengthy name.

Julia Con. has levied an assessment of three cents per share.

Some armored automobiles have been made in France for shipment to Russia. Now the Government may get them with some hope.
